Continuous Dopaminergic Stimulation in Parkinson's disease. Nabil Aly. GM. 7, July, 2015. Parkinson's disease (PD) is a neurodegenerative disease characterised by a progressive degeneration of dopaminergic neurons and the subsequent reduction of striatal dopamine levels. Approximately 80% of the striatal nerve terminal and up to 60% of dopaminergic neurons in the substantia nigra must be

Treatment of Parkinson's disease aims to replace dopaminergic transmission at striatal synapses. In the normal state, nigral neurons fire continuously, exposing striatal dopamine receptors to relatively constant levels of dopamine. In the disease state, periodic dosing and the short half-life of Continuous dopaminergic stimulation (CDS) and Parkinson's In a healthy brain, brain cells release dopamine relatively constantly which ensures adequate control of movement and behaviour. In people with Parkinson's, dopaminergic medications are prescribed to make up for insufficient dopamine production due to loss of dopamine-producing neurons in a specific brain region called the substantia nigra.

Continuous dopaminergic stimulation in Parkinson's disease (PD) has several advantages over pulsatile, non-continuous, stimulation. Several clinical and experimental observations have shown that continuous stimulation of dopaminergic receptors induces fewer complications, such as dyskinesia, compared to pulsatile stimulation [1, 2].

PURPOSE OF REVIEW: We aim to review the most interesting recent advances on the clinical aspects of continuous dopaminergic stimulation in Parkinson's disease. RECENT FINDINGS: Several large, open-label studies have presented data that are in line with the randomized controlled trial on L-dopa-carbidopa intestinal gel infusion, which shows that a continuous drug delivery can improve motor Continuous dopaminergic stimulation: Is it the answer to ...

Continuous dopaminergic stimulation (CDS) is a treatment strategy hypothesized to avoid or reduce the motor complications of long term levodopa therapy, motor fluctuations, and dyskinesia, by preventing or reversing sensitization induced by pulsatile dopaminergic stimulation. The CDS hypothesis is itself based on several hypotheses. First, tonic dopaminergic stimulation is physiological. Second, sensitization is undesirable and should be reversed. Third, reduction of
